A collection of politicians, to pontification much inclined,
Went to see the Elephant, though all were really blind,
So that each by observation might satisfy their mind.

The first, who chanced to touch the ear, said: "Even a snob
Can see what this resembles most; at a time when millions sob,
This marvel called an Elephant is that ever illusive job!"

The second approached it slowly, and happening to take
The squiming trunk with his hands, thus boldly up and spake:
"This animal is nothing but a slimy green socialistic snake!"

The third reached out and felt around the knee's foundation,
"What most this wonderous beast is like," began his salutation,
"Is the pillar of a strong and mighty corporation!"

The fourth approached creature, and happening to walk
Against its broad and sturdy side, at once began to talk:
"This Elephant, if nothing else, is perfect for my chalk!"

The next no sooner had begun about the being to opine,
When it's swinging tail fell within his line,
"No, no, this is simply the end of a capitalistic swine!"

The last, feeling of the tusk, cried, "What have we here
So very big, hard and deadly! To me 'tis mighty clear
This is that billion dollar PAC every candidate fears."

These experts from Washing-town disputed loud and long,
Each professing their contention, exceedingly stiff and strong,
All sure they were right, even as all were absolutely wrong!
